1  SUMMARY

This report analyses the number and nature of commercial operations in listed buildings in 500 m radius areas in 55 locations in towns and cities in England and compares with use of non-listed buildings. It also estimates the total number of commercial operations in listed buildings in England.

It is a repeat of an analysis done, using similar methodology, for the Heritage Lottery Fund and Historic England ${ }^{1}$ in 2012.

It is a companion to a study assessing creative industries in conservation areas. That work is issued separately to avoid confusion because it uses different data and a different definition of creative industries ${ }^{2}$. The research methodology is described in Appendix 1.

The analysis finds there are approximately 142,000 town centre-type commercial operations in listed buildings in the England. Figure 1 summarises them.

[^0]Figure 2 summarises the percentage of all operations that fall into the main use categories analysed - Retail, Eat and Drink and Commercial4.

Figure 3 also shows how the split of types of operation occupying listed buildings compares with the split of types of operation occupying non-listed buildings. It does this by showing the percentage of uses in listed buildings for each category divided by the equivalent percentage for non-listed buildings, expressed as a percentage ${ }^{5}$.

Major differences between the pattern of use of listed buildings and non-listed buildings are:

- Independent, non-branded operations form a much larger proportion of retail and food and beverage businesses occupying listed buildings than occupying nonlisted buildings, in almost all circumstances. This is because the size and features of historic buildings tend to be more suited to independents than mainstream multiples. The difference is much less than it was in 2012, however. This is a reflection of the changing retail environment in town and city centres, with leisure and specialist retail forming a bigger element. Historic areas and buildings are suited to that.
- Comparison retailers, largely independent, form a much higher proportion of operations in places that have high heritage density and, to lesser extent, medium heritage density, and particularly in London and smaller towns. This is particularly true of shops selling fashion. A fashion boutique is almost twice as likely to be in a listed building than in a non-listed building in central London. This reflects the propensity of places with groupings of listed buildings to attract clusters of specialist shops, typically co-existing with places to eat and drink.
- Places to eat and drink form a much larger proportion of occupiers of listed buildings than non-listed buildings in the centres of the main regional cities, smaller towns and in outlying parts of London, reflecting the propensity of heritage environments to nurture leisure quarters.
- Creative Industries have a notably high propensity to locate in listed buildings in the main regional cities and in towns.
- Non-professional services have a much lower propensity to occupy listed buildings than non-listed buildings, especially in places where there is high heritage density.

2 BY HERITAGE DENSITY

Figure 4 shows the average number of commercial operations in listed buildings in 500 m radius areas of a centre point in the 55 places analysed. The places are grouped according to their "heritage density" 6 .
$17 \%$ of structures that are listed in those areas are not capable of use for commercial purposes - they are the like of gates, monuments and remnants. A further $7 \%$ are used for non-commercial purposes like schools and government.

It shows that there are less business operations per all listed buildings in places of high heritage density than places of medium and low density. The explanation for this is that there are more residential occupiers in places with many listed buildings so that listed buildings are less likely, on average, to have a commercial occupier.

[^2]It shows that retail forms a larger percentage of operations in places with high density than those with medium density, which, in turn have a higher percentage than places with low density. This is because extensive heritage townscapes nurture a vibrant retail environment. Places to eat and drink account for about a fifth of all business uses in every situation.

Retail uses account for about 40\% of uses of both listed and non-listed buildings in town and city centres. The proportion of uses in listed buildings increases with heritage density.

The nature of the retail use is different, however. About $28 \%$ of retail occupiers of listed buildings are branded. About $40 \%$ of retail occupiers of non-listed buildings are branded. The proportions do not vary much by heritage density.

Listed buildings are more likely than non-listed buildings to be occupied by business operations that provide eating and drinking.

As with retail, eating and drinking establishments are less likely to be brands if they are in listed buildings.

Figure 8: \% of Eating and Drinking Establishments that are brands

A lower proportion of occupiers of listed buildings are commercial ${ }^{7}$ than in nonlisted buildings across all 55 places, but the difference varies substantially by heritage density. The lower the heritage density, the more likely it is that listed buildings will have a commercial business operation in them.

Figure 10 breaks down the business operation categories into more detail and compares listed and non-listed buildings.

3 BY TYPE OF PLACE

The proportion of use of buildings by shops is similar between listed and non-listed buildings in most circumstances, except it is notably higher in sections of cities outside of the central business district and in towns.

The difference between the proportions of shops occupied by brands is greatest between listed and non-listed buildings in the centre of London and the large regional cities ("core cities").

The proportion of listed buildings occupied by eating and drinking establishments is higher in the Central Business Districts and in towns; it is lower in central London and non-CBD areas of Core Cities.

The proportion of eating and drinking businesses that are brands is higher in nonlisted buildings than in listed buildings in all situations.

The proportion of occupiers of listed buildings that are office and studio based commercial activities is a little lower than for non-listed buildings in most cases.

6  CHANGE SINCE 2012

Figure 20 shows the difference in operations in listed and unlisted buildings compared to the previous study in $2012^{9}$. It suggests there has been a large increase in all activities, even in the retail sector ${ }^{10}$.

Figure 23 shows the change in the number of operations in listed buildings by heritage density. It suggests that places with the highest heritage density have had the biggest increase in number of business operations in listed buildings, with especially large increases in commercial services and branded retail.

Figure 24 suggests that the pattern in different with non-listed buildings, with growth higher in areas with low heritage density than high heritage density. This may be because, however, the higher the heritage density in an area, the less capacity there is for growth in space that can accommodate business activity.

Figure 25 shows how city centres have been achieving the greatest growth of operations in listed buildings. The data suggests a great increase in branded retail services in all areas.

It is especially notable that:

- The proportion of listed buildings occupied by retail brands appears to be increasing at a fast pace, especially in areas of high heritage density. This could be because niche brands are less affected by on-line shopping than mainstream brands and, often, like the size and ambience that historic buildings provide.
- The number of listed buildings occupied by branded restaurants has increased very fast, especially in areas of medium heritage density. This reflects the boom in coffee and casual dining chains, reflected in the list in Figure 17.

APPENDICES

1 METHODOLOGY

The research methodology for assessing the nature of uses in listed buildings involved obtaining databases with relevant information and analysing them. Two databases were used:

- The National Heritage List for England, a list of all listed buildings nationwide, collated by Historic England. The study focuses on uses in listed buildings because there is no database of un-listed historic buildings.
- A list of all the non-residential uses that take place in buildings, called PointX, which is collated by Ordinance Survey ${ }^{11}$. It has data about 4 million places across Great Britain "that can be visited, for business and pleasure". It is compiled from various different data suppliers such as the Local Data Company and Experian.

The approach was to examine areas of a radius of 500 m from a mid-point in the town / city. The rationale is:

- It is easiest to obtain and analyse the data within a circular area. ProMap has an online service that makes it possible to look at the listed buildings, plus other information, within a radius area on a map. Looking at many different towns and city centres on ProMap showed that, in most places, a 500 m radius covers the core of the central business district and most listed buildings in commercial use.
- It provides a standard framework for comparing places. It is possible to compare different places on the basis of the number of listed buildings per 500m radius area, and to assess differences in circumstances between places that have different densities of listed buildings.

The nature of the use of listed buildings has been examined in 55 places, shown in Figure 27. They include just over 12,000 listed structures ${ }^{12}$ in the 500 m radius areas. The places are categorised in two dimensions.

Their "Heritage Density", as measured by the number of listed structures per 500m radius. They are divided into three groups: High Density (300+ listed buildings per 500 m radius), Medium Density (150+ listed buildings per 500m radius), and Low Density (less than 150 listed buildings per 500 m radius).

Nature of Place. This is split into six groups: London Central Business District, London Non-Central Business District, Core Cities ${ }^{13}$ Central Business District, Core Cities Non-Central Business District, Small Cities/Large Towns and Towns.

[^6]Figure 27: Places Analysed

Each point of interest on the Point $X$ database is classified into one of more than 600 types, which are combined into 9 different sets: accommodation, eating and drinking; attractions; commercial services; education and health; manufacturing and production; public infrastructure; retail; sport and entertainment; and transport.

Five of those categories were analysed for the study: accommodation, eating and drinking; commercial services; retail; and sport and entertainment.

The points of interest were then re-categorised into a smaller number in order to reduce the complexity and make it easier to see patterns. They were reorganised into the following categories:

RETAIL

Convenience - mainly food shops and newsagents.
Fashion - clothing, jewellery, shoe and cosmetic stores.
Retail Services ${ }^{14}$ - hairdressers, phone shops etc.
Comparison - antiques, gifts, photographic equipment etc.
Charity

LEISURE

Eat and Drink - pubs, restaurants and takeaways.

COMMERCIAL

[^7]Professional Services - accountants, employment agents, lawyers etc.
Creative Industries - architects, designers, artists, marketing agencies etc.
Non-Professional Services - building repairs, dating agencies etc.

OTHER

Accommodation - hotels, guest houses etc.
Entertainment
Places of Worship
The Creative Industries study which accompanies this study uses the formal definition provided by the Department of Culture Media and Sport (DCMS), which constitutes a set of standard industry classification (SIC codes). It can do that because it uses data from Companies House which is categorised using SIC codes. This study uses Point $X$ data which does not have SIC codes.

The most challenging and time consuming aspect of the analysis was matching the locations on the two data bases. Both databases were entered into the Colliers GIS system. They both contain addresses, but in different format. They do not match.

We used the GIS system to convert postcodes on the Point $X$ database to spatial points and identified the closest points between both databases. Listed buildings has coordinates which provide the exact spatial point. This method returned about $50 \%$ of the matches. We then split up the addresses into separate parts in Excel (house number, street name, postcode) for both PointX and Listed buildings, and matched that way. We then checked the matches to verify that both related to the same building.

Bristol Central was used as a sample to check that the procedures had worked and the data was reliable.

The result of the matching of the data was a set of uses that take place in listed buildings, divided into Point of Interest Categories, as described above. The data was then sorted and analysed in Excel.

The Point $X$ data was categorised in the same way. The number of uses in nonlisted buildings was obtained by subtracting the number in listed buildings from the total number.

The process does not provide information about the number of buildings that are not listed. That could be done by identifying unique addresses using the PointX database, but was not high priority for this study.

3 GROSSING UP

The methodology for grossing up the results from the 55 places to a national estimate of the number of commercial users of listed buildings has been to categorise other places across England on the same basis as for the 55 places in terms of type of place and heritage density (see the process described in the methodology in Appendix 1 and the classification shown in Figure 27, which shows the letter / number categories) This section describes how it has been done for each type of place.

LONDON

London is especially difficult to deal with because concentrations of listed buildings are scattered and difficult to identify. There are surprisingly few intense concentrations, however, outside the central area. Figure 38 shows how the 32 London Boroughs have been categorised.

"CORE CITIES" (MAIN REGIONAL CITIES)

All the large English cities are included in the basic analysis. It has been assumed that there are 2 low density non-Central Business District areas for each city ( 24 in total) and 8 medium density non-CBD areas in total.

LARGE TOWNS AND SMALL CITIES

A list of towns and cities, with their estimated population at the 2011 census, was obtained from the Office of National Statistics. All those over 50,000 people were categorised as large towns or small cities ${ }^{15}$, 151 in addition to the 50 analysed in the study. ProMap was used to find the number of listed structures within 500 m of a central point.

The charts overleaf show the categorisation.

TOWNS

940 places in England are categorised as towns ${ }^{16}$. About 140 of them are included in the large towns category.

It has been assumed that there are 800 in total over and above those in the 55 analysed in the study, that $10 \%(80)$ have high heritage density, $25 \%$ (200) have medium heritage density and the remainder (520) have low density.

[^0]:    ${ }^{1}$ Called English Heritage at the time.
    ${ }^{2}$ Explained in Appendix 1.
    ${ }^{3}$ Percentages are different to Figure 2 because of the effect of grossing up. Figure 2 is percentages in the 55 places. Figure 1 is percentages when grossed up to all UK.

[^1]:    ${ }^{4}$ Retail and Commercial in turn subdivided into main sub-categories.
    ${ }^{5}$ i.e. a figure of $100 \%$ means that the proportion of uses in listed buildings in the category concerned is twice as high as the proportion in non-listed buildings; a figure of $-50 \%$ means that the proportion of uses in listed buildings in the category concerned is half as high as the proportion in non-listed buildings.

[^2]:    ${ }^{6}$ See Figure 27 for list of places.

[^3]:    $\mid{ }^{7}$ As defined in this study.

[^4]:    ${ }^{8}$ The category codes are Colliers codes for categorising places by type

[^5]:    ${ }^{9}$ Excludes Entertainment, Accommodation & Places of Worship, which were not included in 2012. It removes the five additional places which were included in 2018.
    ${ }^{10}$ The capacity for increase in business uses is, of course, less for listed buildings than non-listed buildings because there is little or no opportunity to increase the amount of space provided in listed buildings.

[^6]:    ${ }^{11}$ The data was purchased from the Landmark Information Group under licence to Colliers International.
    ${ }^{12}$ In all uses.
    ${ }^{13}$ The term given to the eight largest cities outside London: Birmingham, Bristol, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle, Nottingham and Sheffield. All are included in the study.

[^7]:    ${ }^{14}$ Many of these are included in the Commercial rather than Retail in the Point of Interest categorisation.

[^8]:    ${ }^{15}$ This is crude because the population of the administrative district that represents the town/city is often not a good reflection of the population of its catchment area.

[^9]:    ${ }^{16}$ Historically, towns were any settlement with a charter, including market towns and ancient boroughs. The process of incorporation was reformed in 1835 and many more places received borough charters, whilst others were lost. All existing boroughs were abolished on 1 April 1974 and borough status was reformed as a civic honour for local government districts. Since 1 April 1974 any parish council in England has the right to resolve to call itself a town and several communities have taken up this right, including areas that preserved continuity with charter trustees.
