1 INTRODUCTION

To date, with a few notable exceptions, very little has been written about World War II Prisoner of War Camps in the British Isles. This is surprising given that a large volume of documentary material exists at the Public Records Office, Kew (now The National Archives). Even less work has been undertaken to identify the total population and location of the camps. Incomplete lists have been published in a number of magazines and on the Internet, but often the addresses given have not been sufficiently detailed to permit an accurate interpretation. However, Dr Anthony Hellen, having undertaken his own research on the subject, provided English Heritage with a list of sites drawn from documentation held at The National Archives and the ICRC Archives in Geneva, to assist with our identification of sites. This was a timely approach as English Heritage staff were at this time considering whether to recommend the scheduling of Camp 93 (Harperley Camp) in County Durham and there was clear need to establish a national context for making that decision.

Defining exactly what constitutes a Prisoner of War camp is difficult because of the immense variety of types, sizes, and classes of buildings used. The number and types of camp varied throughout the war. In addition to the base camps, a large number of semi-autonomous hostels were established out in the country, and a large number of PoWs were billeted on farms. For the purposes of this report a Prisoner of War camp will be any site or building that has been used to house military prisoners captured by the Allies and which appeared in the numerical listing system used by the British authorities.

Each Prisoner of War camp was allocated an official number during World War II within a prescribed numerical sequence, ranging from Camp 1 (Grizedale Hall, Ambleside) through to Camp 1026 (Raynes Park, Wimbledon). This numbering sequence has posed problems for the assessment as some sites have different numbers at different dates (Quorn Camp, Leicestershire – Camp 9 and Camp 183), the same camp number can be used for different locations (Camp 17 – Lodge Moor Camp, Sheffield, and 22 Hyde Park Gardens, London) and some sites have a letter suffix rather than a distinctly different number (Camp 139b Coxhoe Hall, County Durham). Without further documentary research it is hard to tell whether the inconsistencies in the numbering system were the result of a deliberate policy, or of the fluidity of the situation. There is certainly documentation held in The National Archives to show that the British were unwilling to release the location of Prisoner of War camps to the Germans due to the fear of possible paratroop raids to release them. The Germans on the other hand indicated that they were seeking the information to ensure that they did not bomb the camps by mistake.

Not all sites listed within the numbering sequence are true Prisoner of War camps; many are hostels situated some distance away from the parent site, or base camp. These base camps often parented up to seven hostels; no attempt has been made during this assessment to specifically locate these hostel sites, unless they already appeared in the list provided by Dr Hellen. A sample list of hostels associated with three camps – Camp 93 (Harperley), Camp 81 (Pingley) and Camp 35 (Boughton Park Camp) has been prepared to serve as an example to illustrate the potential number of such sites on a national basis. Some additional Prisoner of War camps discovered from other sources have been added to the original list of sites, for example through records of the International Red Cross and the Defence of Britain Project.

2 DESCRIPTION

During the early part of the war there was no standard design of camp, although a commonality of function dictated a certain similarity of component structures and basic layouts. To begin with, there were not very many camps established and those that were could be broken down into four distinct classes:

- command cages,
- interrogation centres,
- transit camps, and
- internment camps.

The internment camps were built to hold civilian aliens detained in this country or captured abroad; the remainder were built to detain captured military personnel. Command cages were either in pre-existing buildings, or else little more than fenced holding enclosures. These early camps comprised a mixture of accommodation including pre-existing structures, huts, and tents. Once the German prisoners had been interrogated and classified according to their political views – Grey, Black, or White, they were transported to camps in Canada to obviate the risk of their release by enemy paratroopers. It should also be borne in mind that during the early war years the number of German prisoners taken by the British armed forces was relatively low and comprised chiefly of airmen and naval personnel.

This situation began to change following the success of the 8th Army's North African Campaign against the Italian Army. The substantial number of prisoners taken during this campaign were initially held in camps in North Africa, but eventually a large proportion were brought to the British Isles to be held in purpose built or 'Standard' camps. Although contracts for the building of these camps were issued during late 1942 and early 1943 to a number of well-known construction companies, the prisoners built many of these 'Standard' camps themselves, living under canvas until the accommodation was complete. The most common variety of building used was the 18ft 6in-span Ministry of War Production (MoWP) standard hut, although some sectional timber, Laing, 16-ft and 24-ft span Nissen, British Concrete Federation (BCF) and Orlihuts were used at a number of sites.

Camp 81 (Pingley Camp) at Brigg in Lincolnshire is a typical example of a 'Standard Camp'. It was built to house some 750 prisoners, and consisted of a tented camp, guards' compound, prisoners' compound, prisoners' garden plots, recreation ground and a sewage disposal works. An outer plain wire fence supported by concrete posts and an inner barbed wire fence enclosed the prisoner compound and the recreation ground. Within the prisoners' compound a 'sterile' area was established between the inner fence and a further coiled 'Danart' barbed wire entanglement. Contrary to popular belief there were no guard towers at most of these camps, as the prisoners held at the majority of them were usually considered 'low risk'. That is not to say that guard towers were a rarity; indeed they are quite a common feature at a number of the early and later PoW camps.

The complex was accessed from a public highway by a single-track spine road. The guards' compound consisted of a group of some fifteen huts – administration offices, soldiers' quarters and ablutions, officers' quarters and mess, fuel store, detention block (calaboose) and a brick water tower occupied a rectangular parcel of land immediately north of the main gate to the prisoners' compound. Due to its more substantial construction, the water tower is often the only structure left at a number of sites that have been demolished, as at Camp 56 (Botesdale, Diss). The prisoners' compound occupied a six-acre square area of land and contained 35 huts, including a cookhouse, grocery and produce store, two dining huts, two recreation huts, drying room and showers, two ablution and latrine blocks, a camp reception station (sick quarters), a living and carpenter's hut, and 23 living huts.

The majority of the living huts at the camp are ten-bay MoWP standard huts built using pre-cast reinforced concrete frames and wall panels, but eight of them were Laing composite timber-framed huts clad in weather boarding and internally lined with plaster-board. Secondary cladding with bitumised corrugated iron sheets has since altered the appearance of these huts. All of the MoWP huts used for domestic purposes - cookhouse, ablutions, latrines etc. - were constructed in a different manner to that of the living huts, with hollow clay blocks, or bricks laid on their sides (economy construction) being used in lieu of the concrete panels.

Both the MoWP and the Laing living huts were sixty-feet in length and built in ten six feet bays with windows occupying alternate bays. Outward opening doors with padlock hasps were located in each gable wall. The interiors were open-plan and heated by two cast iron pot-belly stoves. One living hut was sub-divided, providing accommodation for the camp leader and a carpenter's workshop. The variety of hut types used also varies geographically; Nissen huts and Laing huts were much more frequent in the south east of the country than they were in the north. Camp 116 (Mill Lane Camp, Hatfield Heath) conforms to the so-called 'Standard' layout, with the guards' compound consisting of MoWP huts, while the living huts are all timber Laing huts.

The largest single structure within the prisoners' compound was the Camp Reception Station (CRS), also known as the sick bay, hospital, or the Red Cross building. The CRS consisted of three interlinked MoWP huts. The left hand eight-bay range contained the Medical Officer's Room, Dental Surgeon's Room, Orderly Rooms and a variety of store rooms, showers and lavatories. The main and isolation wards occupied the twelve-bay central range, while the remaining seven-bay range contained a boiler room, pantry, kitchen, and the Medical Officer's Bedroom. This building can be found in one form or another at almost all PoW camps, but was not necessarily always built using the same hut types. The example at Camp 81 (Pingley) retains its original plan form and all of the room functions written in Italian can still be read when cross-lit, for example Gabinetto Dentistico (Dental Surgeon), Sula Pulizia (Sluice) etc.

One issue that still remains to be determined relates to the construction of the MoWP huts. Hollow clay blocks were used as nogging in most of the guard compound buildings, and the CRS, cookhouse and dining hall, ablutions, latrines and showers within the prisoners' compound; the living huts however have concrete panels as nogging. To date no clear explanation has been discovered to explain this difference.

Italian graffiti seem to be a feature at many camps. Usually in pencil, they can be found on the base coat of paint, the lining paper, or on the plasterboard surfaces. They usually take the form of setting out marks, translations of building and construction terminology, English phrases such as 'Hello I love you', poems, names, and doodles.

More formalized artwork also seems to be a feature of the PoW camps, varying in quality and execution. This work can range from Germanic gothic script signs, through to elaborate murals.

Such artwork can be found in almost any hut in a prisoners' compound, The subject matter can also vary dramatically, but three subjects recur at a number of sites – landscapes, cartoons, and women. Buildings that have communal functions such as recreation rooms, theatres, and chapels also can receive architectural decoration, this can take a number of forms ranging from geometric painted wall panels to mock curtains and pelmets made of hardboard and painted to represent plaid or gingham designs. Chapel interiors were often austere, particularly if the building had a secondary function, but where the building had a single role the decoration was often very elaborate ranging from Gothic to Baroque in style. Such items as the altar rail, piscina, altar and reredos were usually made by the prisoners themselves. As yet, none have been found in situ in England, although examples are known to survive both in Wales and Scotland. The reredos from Camp 71 (Sheriffhales) was recovered prior to the demolition of the chapel and is currently stored in Whitchurch, Shropshire.

After 1944 and particularly following the surrender of Germany and the return of prisoners from Canada and the USA, many of the camps were hard pressed to hold the sheer number of prisoners and many had additional accommodation comprising bell tents erected within the prisoners' compound. In May 1946 Camp 81 (Pingley) was responsible for 1862 prisoners, 984 of whom were housed at the camp and the remainder were either billeted out, or lived at one of four hostels: Elsham Hall, Elsham Mount, Elsham Manor, and Scawby. At some camps the capacity was substantially increased by the erection of new prisoners' compounds. Accommodation was mostly provided under canvas, but a few sites like Camp 86 (Stanhope Camp) at Ashchurch in Kent eventually acquired additional 16-ft span Nissen huts to replace the tents.

The division between the type of accommodation provided for the guards and prisoners did vary at a number of camps, particularly those erected during 1940 and after D-Day. Camp 33 (Dancers Hill, South Mimms) is typical of this type: the guards were provided with hatted accommodation, while the prisoners slept under canvas. Strictly speaking no Prisoner of War was supposed to be held under canvas during the winter months, but given the sheer volume of sites where the majority of the accommodation was of this nature, it is clear that some prisoners were held contrary to this rule.

The impact of the thousands of prisoners on surrounding communities has been discussed at length in Dr Anthony Hellens' paper, 'Temporary settlements and transient populations. The legacy of Britain's Prisoner of War camps'. Erdkunde (Archive for Scientific Geography) 53(3), 191–219, (1999), but a further legacy in the form of physical evidence of the prisoners' creative activities lies beyond the boundaries of the PoW camps. These can range widely both in form and in materials, and in geographical distribution. A series of large oil paintings depicting the stations of the cross painted by an Italian PoW can be found at the Roman Catholic church of St Thomas of Canterbury at Wolsingham in County Durham. What is even more remarkable about these paintings is that they are mounted in decorative wooden frames made by a German PoW. Concrete statues of Romulus and Remus greet visitors entering Stoberry Park, Wells, Somerset. Similar concrete ornamental features including a fountain and a model castle can be found at the former RAF Little Rissington, Gloucestershire. At the Warcop Army Training Estate in Cumbria carved stone blocks have been placed in the flanking walls of a tank range blockhouse.

METHODOLOGY

Given the poor quality of the original address information in wartime documentation, often only giving the camp number and nearest town or village, a map-based search was undertaken to identify basic locations. For this purpose the mid-1950s Ordnance Survey 1:10650 scale 6-inch 'Revision Series' maps produced the best results, usually showing individual huts and camp boundaries with great accuracy, many of which were identified as 'work camps' or 'agricultural workers hostels'. Where the map evidence failed to provide clear results, the location of sites was obtained by the interpretation of aerial photographs held at the National Monuments Record Centre, Kemble Drive, Swindon.

Although many camps are readily identifiable, some of those established during the early war years proved more difficult to identify as they were located within pre-existing structures or complexes - country houses, Territorial Army camps, cotton mills, racecourses etc. The difficulty in obtaining a positive identification becomes more acute with the later wartime sites as these camps were located in all manner of buildings, none of which are readily definable as PoW camps on maps, or on aerial photographs, unless they had a wire perimeter with watchtowers, as at Camp 1009 Northway, Ashchurch, Tewkesbury. This situation also applies to urban camps that have proved virtually impossible to locate by photo interpretation, unless they were situated in parkland, or were enclosed by a barbed wire fence with watchtowers. One feature that has greatly assisted the photo interpretation of the later sites has been the existence of knot gardens and formal flower borders at PoW sites. This fact has been of particular significance as they do not appear on British military sites.

3.1 Stage One – Cartography

Using the site list drawn up by Dr Anthony Hellen, the Defence of Britain Project, and other sources, approximate four-figure National Grid References were obtained by referring to the Ordnance Survey Gazetteer of Great Britain and the Bartholemew Gazetteer of the British Isles. These four-figure grid references were then plotted on the relevant OS 1:50000 scale maps to obtain an approximate site identification. These plots were then checked against OS 1:25000 and 1:10000 scale maps. Unfortunately, due to site attrition and the modern depiction of features, it was virtually impossible to positively identify the camps on these maps. Resort was then made to mid-1950s OS 1:10650 scale '6-inch Revision Series' maps to obtain the necessary quality of depiction to provide a feature-centred grid reference. Even with these maps it was not always possible to obtain positive site identification.

3.2 Stage Two – Interpretation of Post-war Vertical Aerial Photographs

Having obtained eight, six or four-figure grid references for the majority of the listed sites, a cover search for all immediate post-war vertical photographs was undertaken by Kelly Scutts at the National Monuments Record Centre, Swindon. Coverage was obtained for ninety-three percent of the sites requested. These photographs were then examined stereoscopically to establish the exact extent and location of the camps. During this process it was clear that the approximate grid references obtained by the use of the gazetteers were not always sufficiently accurate to guarantee the retrieval of the correct photographs. This was partly due to the incorrect spelling of camp names in original documentation, some of which were correctly re-identified and others were not.

Variations in the physical condition and the quality of the photographic prints were also factors in determining whether it was possible to make a positive site identification or not. If it was not possible to obtain a positive identification by this method, an approximate four-figure grid reference was allocated for the site. Where a site was positively identified a six or eight-figure grid reference was generated for the centre, or for the largest group of surviving features.

3.3 Stage Three – Assessment of Modern Vertical Aerial Photographs

The location information drawn from the previous two stages was used to guide the examination of modern vertical aerial photographic coverage available on the Getmapping website, permitting an up to date qualitative and quantitative statement to be made for each site. It should be noted that it proved impossible to identify any site that had not been located on the post-war coverage first. The resolution of the Getmapping coverage was not always sufficiently good to positively identify known urban sites such as Camp 253 (Mousehold Heath, Norwich).

4 CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM

In order to maintain a continuity of presentation, the classification system adopted is the same as the one used in previous MPP aerial photographic assessments carried out by Michael J. Anderton. A basic grading system was applied to each site ranging from 1 to 5 and was designed to ensure a simple guide for those involved with designation and development control decision making. The classification system is listed below:

- 1 Complete
Majority of original structures (i.e. water tower, offices, officers mess, canteen, guard room, barrack huts, ablutions/showers/drying room, cell block, camp reception station, cookhouse, dining rooms, recreation rooms, and living huts) and layout remain intact. Internal fittings may or may not be present.
- 2 Near Complete
Majority of features remain extant, i.e. 50 – 80% survival.
- 3 Partial Remains
Less than 50% of components remain (ranging from structures to paths / roads).
- 4 Removed
All structures removed from site; footprint may survive.
- 5 Unresolved
Evidence is either not visible, or inconclusive, when based on the resources consulted (i.e. maps and / or aerial photographs).

NB These classifications only represent assessments of the volume of surviving buildings and features observed by the examination of aerial photographs. It must be borne in mind that aerial photographic interpretation is not an exact science and differentiation of features can be difficult. For example, Camp 54 (Longbridge Camp, Hampton Lovett, Droitwich) appears to be complete on modern aerial photographs, but in fact has been demolished and the hut bases used for caravan hardstandings.

5 PROJECT ANALYSIS

5.1 Site Survival

Although there is a numeric sequence of 1026 PoW Camps (Table 1), there is no indication that this total was ever fully utilised. Substantial gaps exist in the sequence that are common to all sources consulted. Nevertheless, a number of sites have been located that remain unidentified and presumably fitted into the sequence somewhere. Duplication of numbers allocated and re-numbering of sites further clouds the issue of the total population. From the data gathered a total of 372 identified sites has been established in England and the Channel Islands (Tables 2 & 3); if the sites in the Isle of Man, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland (Tables 5, 6 & 7) are added, a total of 456 is obtained. A further addition of 31 as yet unidentified sites (Table 8) brings the national total to 487.

The survival of a site is dependant on a number of factors - origin, location, reclamation of farmland, class of use / re-use, longevity of use, type of construction, urban expansion, abandonment and dereliction. The most important of these factors would appear to be a rural location and the longevity of continuous use. The survival of all types of camp is relatively poor, but from the point of view of this survey, it is the purpose-built 'Standard' type that survives best (Table 4). A total of 71 of these camps have been identified in England, and these figure can be broken down to give the following results:

Table 1 Classification of Survival of Total Known Population (England)

Class 1	Complete	12
Class 2	Near Complete	14
Class 3	Partial Remains	34
Class 4	Demolished	177
Class 5	Unresolved	132
		370

Table 2 Classification of Survival of 'Standard' type Camps (England)

Class 1	Complete	5
Class 2	Near Complete	7
Class 3	Partial remains	10
Class 4	Demolished	49
Class 5	Unresolved	0

Due to the large number of unresolved sites in the total known population, a precise survival percentage cannot be obtained, though we can state that 17% of the 'Standard' types survive as either complete or near complete examples of their class. Of those that do survive, one site (Camp 93 Harperley) has already been scheduled and another (Camp 81 Pingley ) has been assessed and mitigation measures put in place. However, it is important to stress that all surviving sites will have a degree of significance, even where only plan form remains. These sites will be significant for historical and social reasons, and in view of their local impact and contribution to sense of place.

N.B. Bold figures in Tables 3 & 4 represent sites where buildings and features survive. It must also be borne in mind that the footprint of a Class 4 site may still survive in earthwork form, or a series of hut bases and paths. The fact that the site has been demolished does not necessarily mean that there are no remains.

5.2 Change and Destruction

It is frequently not appreciated that the majority of PoW camps remained active in their original role until 1948. After this date many were removed for a variety of reasons, chief of which were post-war reconstruction and the reclamation of agricultural land. However, a large number of these sites, particularly the purpose built ones, were handed over to the administration of a number of county agricultural committees who ran them as hostels for farm workers. Many of these farm workers were the very same men who had been held in them as prisoners, but who elected to remain in Britain rather than be repatriated. These hostels often continued to function as such well into the late 1960s and early 1970s. Some even continued into the 1980s as foreign student hostels, for example Concordia Camp, Brigg (Camp 81, Pingley Farm). Friday Bridge Camp, Cambridgeshire is believed to be the only site that continues to function in this role today.

Once the sites were abandoned, generally they were given low-grade agricultural uses with the minimum of maintenance; consequently the prolonged usage has assisted the survival of the camps, but the lack of maintenance means that the overall condition of the surviving buildings is poor. When examining these sites today, the prolonged usage does raise the need for care in interpretation, particularly with regard to surviving fittings and fixtures, and wall art. Paintings and drawings are a feature of a number of camps, but care does have to be taken in establishing whether they date from the wartime use of the site, or later use as a hostel.

Overall, the so-called 'Standard' Prisoner of War camp has not fared particularly well as a class of building since the end of their original use in 1947 – 48. Of the total known population in England, very nearly 70% have been lost to a number of agencies:-

5.3 Recommendations for Further Research

As stated above, the purpose of this report was to establish the geographical location, and an overall assessment of the relative survival of Prisoner of War camps in England; consequently it was beyond the scope of this work to examine the large volume of records held by The National Archives, and to establish the history, or exact function of any particular camp. From the cursory examinations that have been made, it is clear that a considerable amount of work would have to be undertaken to gain a full understanding of the subject, similar to that previously undertaken by Dr Colin Dobinson for other monument classes of World War II. As is stated in the Modern Military Matters research framework (Schofield 2003), further research could also be extended to include social history, and embracing documentary evidence held in the national archives of Canada, Germany, Italy, and the United States of America. Specific questions might include:

- how, where, and when prisoners were held;
- what constituted a Prisoner of War camp;
- the use of small hostels, and the billeting out of prisoners on farms;
- the importance of PoW labour to food production, and the wartime and post-war economy;
- the important role played by PoW camps in the reconciliation and 'de-nazification' process and
- the educational opportunities provided to PoWs.

There is a clear and very urgent need for an international oral history project to be established both in the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany, together with the active seeking out and copying of documents and photographs held by former PoWs.

7 GAZETTEER LAYOUT

The gazetteer in this report provides the following information:

National Grid Reference (NGR).

1:50 000 Ordnance Survey 'Landranger' map sheet number.

Camp number.

Camp name and address.

County name as given in contemporary official wartime and post-war documents.

Classification of survival.

Type of camp as identified by the International Red Cross in 1945.

Comments.

Additional lists are available, and can be consulted in the bound report, which is lodged with the NMR and Savile Row English Heritage libraries. These lists include: one of the Standard type of PoW camps listed according to survival, county and numerical order; all camps in county order for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland; PoW camps/hostels that remain unidentified; alien internment camps, PoiW cages; and a sample of some PoW hostels. PoW camps in Wales, Scotland, Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man are included, but little attempt has been made to obtain a National Grid Reference or a classification of survival for any of these sites. This will require additional work. This project was necessarily confined to England.
